Three years ago my husband and I took a holiday in Montmartre, France. We'd been planning for this for well over two years - budgeting, writing our itinerary, learning the language, or at least the basic phrases we would need to get by, ... With such high hopes we longed to see the architecture and immerse ourselves in the culture, the cuisine, the history,... Yet even as we flew in, the landscape was enveloped by walls of gray clouds. The turbulence was awful, in the airport terminal we gawked at the downpour, and hailing our taxi, we were buffeted by gusts and rain. Check in at our resort was hours away and we were simply soaked. Our appearance was so dreadful, we had no choice but to abandon our first night's reservation at a white linen dining room in favor of a simple meal at a corner bistro. I remember we enjoyed a romantic, if not luxurious dinner on a covered patio, sipping bisque and champagne, and serenaded by a baritone accompanied by violin.

Years later, I would capture the scene in oil: The cool gray sky, the glistening white raindrops, the yellow moon breaking through lines in the cloud cover, and the bluish glow of the basilica, the mocha brown wood of the patio, the baritone in his red jacket, I in my white dress and my husband in his navy blazer. I remember, when I first set to paint the scene. As I set the first few brush-strokes to the canvas, it was like magic. I could recall the scene so vividly and the colors just flowed from my hand. It brought tears of joy to my eyes when I finished the painting. I looked at it and I sobbed, "That's Montmartre. We have to go back."
